President-Elect 'One Swell Boss'

Former Office Boy Recalls Fine Traits of Franklin D. Roosevelt

By HORTENSE SAUNDERS

MINEOLA, L. I. (CP)—Stenographers, telephone girls, errand boys and office boys who worked for Franklin D. Roosevelt—Dick Roosevelt during the next four years are to be congratulated according to William Brett, one of his former office boys, who relates him as a "swell boss" and "a regular guy" against—and I've known plenty of 'em.

William was Bill in those days, a tow-headed, freckle-faced youngster, 13 years old, employed in New York offices of a large business concern. That was back in 1924, Roosevelt was not the big shot he is today, although many of whom seemed much more important, and were much richer than he. No one had ever mentioned him as a presidential possibility. He was just a young man who had been stricken by bad luck in his bid of a yacht trophy.

Just what made him such a hero Bill has difficulty in ascertaining.

"Not any one thing, but everything," he finally decided. "He was just a personality. Something about him warms you up right away. Makes you feel important. Without realizing it, you start being polite. You do your work conscientiously, you know he's a square fellow."

It was on his first job that Bill encountered Franklin D. Roosevelt. Though he hasn't a clear picture, today, of anyone else connected with that office, Bill remembers Governor Roosevelt's entrance and recalls the atmosphere he created.

"Lots of times he wouldn't be at the office for days," Bill remarks. "He had many other interested at the time. But when he came in, he put life right into it. Everything would be friendly and business. The place would come to life and there would be an entirely different spirit. He brought with him an excitement and activity peculiarly his own.

"Office work depend on the place. Always he had a kind word and a smile for everyone, including the office boy—that's rare enough in business offices to make you remember. He'd stop and talk about the 'big boss' stuff or him on the fireworks for his own benefit.

"I've never seen a visitor that didn't their right out with him, nor have I seen one come in that wasn't glad to see him. Roosevelt was a born politician, a fellow, who was a boss himself and could do as he pleased, took so much trouble with everyone else. He was a regular guy against—and I know.

Bill observed, too, that his boss used excellent English, and had a pleasant voice. With youthful dreams of being a big business executive himself, Bill enrolled in a night school, studying grammar.

"An office boy usually gets something on the boss," Bill went on. "But I never detected anything phoney about Franklin D. Roosevelt. He always was conservatively dressed. You never saw him in a loud suit or flashy trimmings. No display about him, nothing snobbish, and no fancy gimcracks in his office.

He kept his desk so neat I had to laugh. It was always clear. He didn't go in for fancy ink holders or gloss supplies. He could get through a bunch of mail faster than anyone I ever saw, and see people at the same time. I don't know how he did it.

"I will say this, too, he wasn't a member of the three-hour-for-lunch club. Many a time I'd rush out and get a sandwich and a glass of milk for him, and he'd have it right at his desk.

Versed in the interests of a well-rounded picture, to recall some scolding he received from Roosevelt, or some incident that might show a more human side, Bill sat for a while, then scratched his head and wrinkled his brow, but memory yielded nothing.

"Just one swell boss," was his verdict.

On hearing the news that Roosevelt had been nominated for president, Bill immediately dispatched to him a letter of congratulations, and pledged his support, although he lives in a strongly Republican district. He received a cordial letter he received in reply, and takes some modest credit for the fact that the Mineola district went Democratic for the first time in its history.

No longer an office boy, Bill now is a married man and a father, working in the Mineola gas company. When asked whether he would like to go back to work for Roosevelt, his eyes sparkled:

"Would I—I'll say I would!"

The other difficulty arose when police carried a passenger from a second class compartment in the Dunkirk train to make room for Trotzky. The passenger protested volubly.

No Retrenchment In Catholic Church

CHICAGO, Nov. 22. (AP)—The Roman Catholic church was placed on record today as favoring no retrenchment in the face of economic necessary in its expansion program for 1933.

Cardinals, archbishops, and bishops of the church met with prominent laymen at the Catholic Charity Extension society and were informed the church's budget would be only 10 per cent less than last year.

"The work of the church must be carried on with renewed vigor in these times of stress," said George Cardinal Mundelein, who presided at the conference. "In fact, there is a greater need for vigor at present than in many years.

"Our people, many of them, need spiritual help. Many have lost their personality. Home more fortunate ones have indicated no slackening in their willingness to assist."

'Domesticated' Weeds to Improve Tobacco Crop

Maryland Growers Making Interesting Experiments With Good Results

WASHINGTON, (AP)—Weeds are being "domesticated" in an experiment in southern Maryland to discover how they may be used to improve tobacco crops.

Growing weeds are useful in this instance, says the Department of Agriculture. It has been found that tobacco grows on land that grew weeds the year before is better than tobacco grown on land usually cropped.

Before the experiment was undertaken a wide mixture of weeds grew on the tobacco lands between crop years, but the Department of Agriculture has planted individual plots to the following weeds: ragweed, beggarweed, stickweed, partridge pea and lambs' quarter.

After the weed crop is harvested the government experimenters will plant tobacco to see what effect the quality to learn if it has been influenced in any way by the weeds grown there previously.

Weeds apparently thrive on opposite conditions from tobacco, and although the weeds grew readily under naturally conditions, they did not grow so readily when they were planted. There was difficulty in making some of the planted weeds grow at all.

Tobacco farmers for many years have known something of the effect of weeds on a tobacco crop the following year, but in times of good prices they had been unwilling to let the land lie idle in weeds.

Now, with tobacco almost too plentiful, farmers who let part of their land lie idle will be able to obtain better tobacco the next season.

Public Esteem Of Guard Troops Hits New High

ed, the report showed, as a saving of more than $500,000 to the federal government. Expenditures during the present of the year previous "in spite of the heavy increase of disbursements for members of the guard for armory drill attendance and field training."

The strength of the National Guard changed little in the past fiscal year, the aggregate on June 30, 1932, being 187,413 of all ranks with an average attendance of 165,158 at armory drills and 160,158 at the field training encampments.

Pennsylvania was 109 percent under quota June 30 in its allotted number of National Guards.

The annual report made public today by Secretary of War Hurley listed 8gen. 434 commissioned officers and 12 warrant officers. The quota was 12,247.

The bureau chief found the condition of the guard's property "unsatisfactory" but "reasonably expected" in the whole third corps area, of which Pennsylvania is a part. He reported that Pennsylvania had a very high percentage of armory physicals and mentally above the average and that the state's quota of "duty" supervisors and to conduct.

Find Plant That Builds Rocks From Water

WASHINGTON, (AP) — A new species of plants that "strain" minerals out of running water and build rocks from them has been found in the Washington by the Geological Survey.

The plants are very small, but nevertheless efficient. Planted in a row like shrubbery, between 100,000 and 200,000 of them would be required to fill an inch of space, and they could not be seen without a microscope. The plant is a variety of the blue-green algae, believed to have been among the earliest living things on earth.

Like larger plants, the algae have the power of photosynthesis, and this is the secret of their pebble-building process. Photosynthesis is the process by which plants build up carbohydrates from carbon dioxide and water with the aid of chlorophyll, the green coloring matter in leaves. Sunlight also enters into the process.

Somehow the process of photosynthesis causes the algae to build up the algae's life. As a result the water loses some of its calcium, iron and manganese, and these minerals are deposited in the form of stony crusts around the algae.

Capital Awaits Debt Payment Day Approach

ell's expression leaving the December payment question entirely with the administration.

With a like positiveness, President Hoover's position as a special session of the present war debts was presented by members of both parties and Mr. Roosevelt, president-elect himself, "refusing . . . agencies of diplomatic intercourse sufficient for handling debt matters.

So officials here awaited the approach of the country day, expecting to collect, but note the less measuring the possibility of default.

Though President Hoover's suggestion that debt payments might be made in properly-guaranteed foreign currencies won approval from some quarters, it was learned today it is regarded as likely of receiving congress' approval in the present session.

From Europe indications that the country would pay the $95,350,000 due on December 15 were received today, reasons believed to justify prolonging the Hoover moratorium. Britain was expected to follow Britain's example and pay interest in full, though international complications were projecting themselves.

very start for the local leader to accept. It would have been inconsistent with his principles to support a reactionary movement if he had taken the appointment only on condition of parliamentary support.

At any rate he could not command that support. The National Socialist party is the largest in the Reichstag, but it is not large enough to form the basis of "capacity to pay." Of this it may be said that the human mind is incapable of measuring capacity to pay over a period of sixty years, and that the Young plan as it stands with its intricacies would prevent a final settlement. The fourth principle is that these debts have no relation to reparations. This again is truer in theory than in practice, for the only possible way of persuading the rest of the world to accept it.

These principles are the dogmatic debris of the post-war muddle. In the circumstances of 1932 Mr. Hoover and Mr. Roosevelt have merely made it a little more difficult for themselves to arrive promptly at a realistic settlement which will yield a substantial return to the American people and obliterate the problem.

There remain the December payments. Here Mr. Roosevelt, quite properly, has refused to intervene and Mr. Hoover has, therefore, taken the whole burden upon himself. He has the authority difficulties the world as they in the case of Britain, the payment be made for the time being in foreign currencies. Whether this meets the immediate situation remains to be seen. Mr. Hoover has at least opened the door for negotiations and the other nations should take advantage of it. Their difficulties are not insuperable if there is a real solidarity stated or than they can afford publicity to avoid. But in a negotiation a way might still be found to get around the immediate difficulty in order to make possible a settlement of the larger questions.

Police Disperse Hunger Group At White House taken in the vicinity before the arrival of the hunger marchers were scattered by police.

Police estimated between 30 and 40 were involved in the affair. The hunger marchers drove in six or seven taxicabs to the White House after a meal at their hall on Georgia avenue, about two miles distant.

Police had expected the march on the 6th. A collision was barely averted when the leading taxi sought to dash into the White House grounds, but was blocked by a motorcycle officer who forced the machine squarely in the cab's path.

Connaon, on being taken from the first machine, demanded his "constitutional rights" to "place a petition before the president," and was informed by Captain Ulysses Carroll of the police force that the president "cannot be seen today."

Police rushed Connaon away as he continued to shout for an audience with the chief executive.

Of the 30 unemployed demonstrators who gathered before the Reconstruction Corporation, three blocks away, to seek another avenue to the White House were turned away by police. They were told they knew about that distance on all sides of the executive mansion.

Another group was turned around by police and forced to march the two miles back under police escort.

The six children detained by police were in one taxi. They were taken to the women's bureau for the night.

Although a police detail remained on duty around the White House demonstrators and authorities said they believed the trouble was over for the day.
